

Lockdown: Look Up

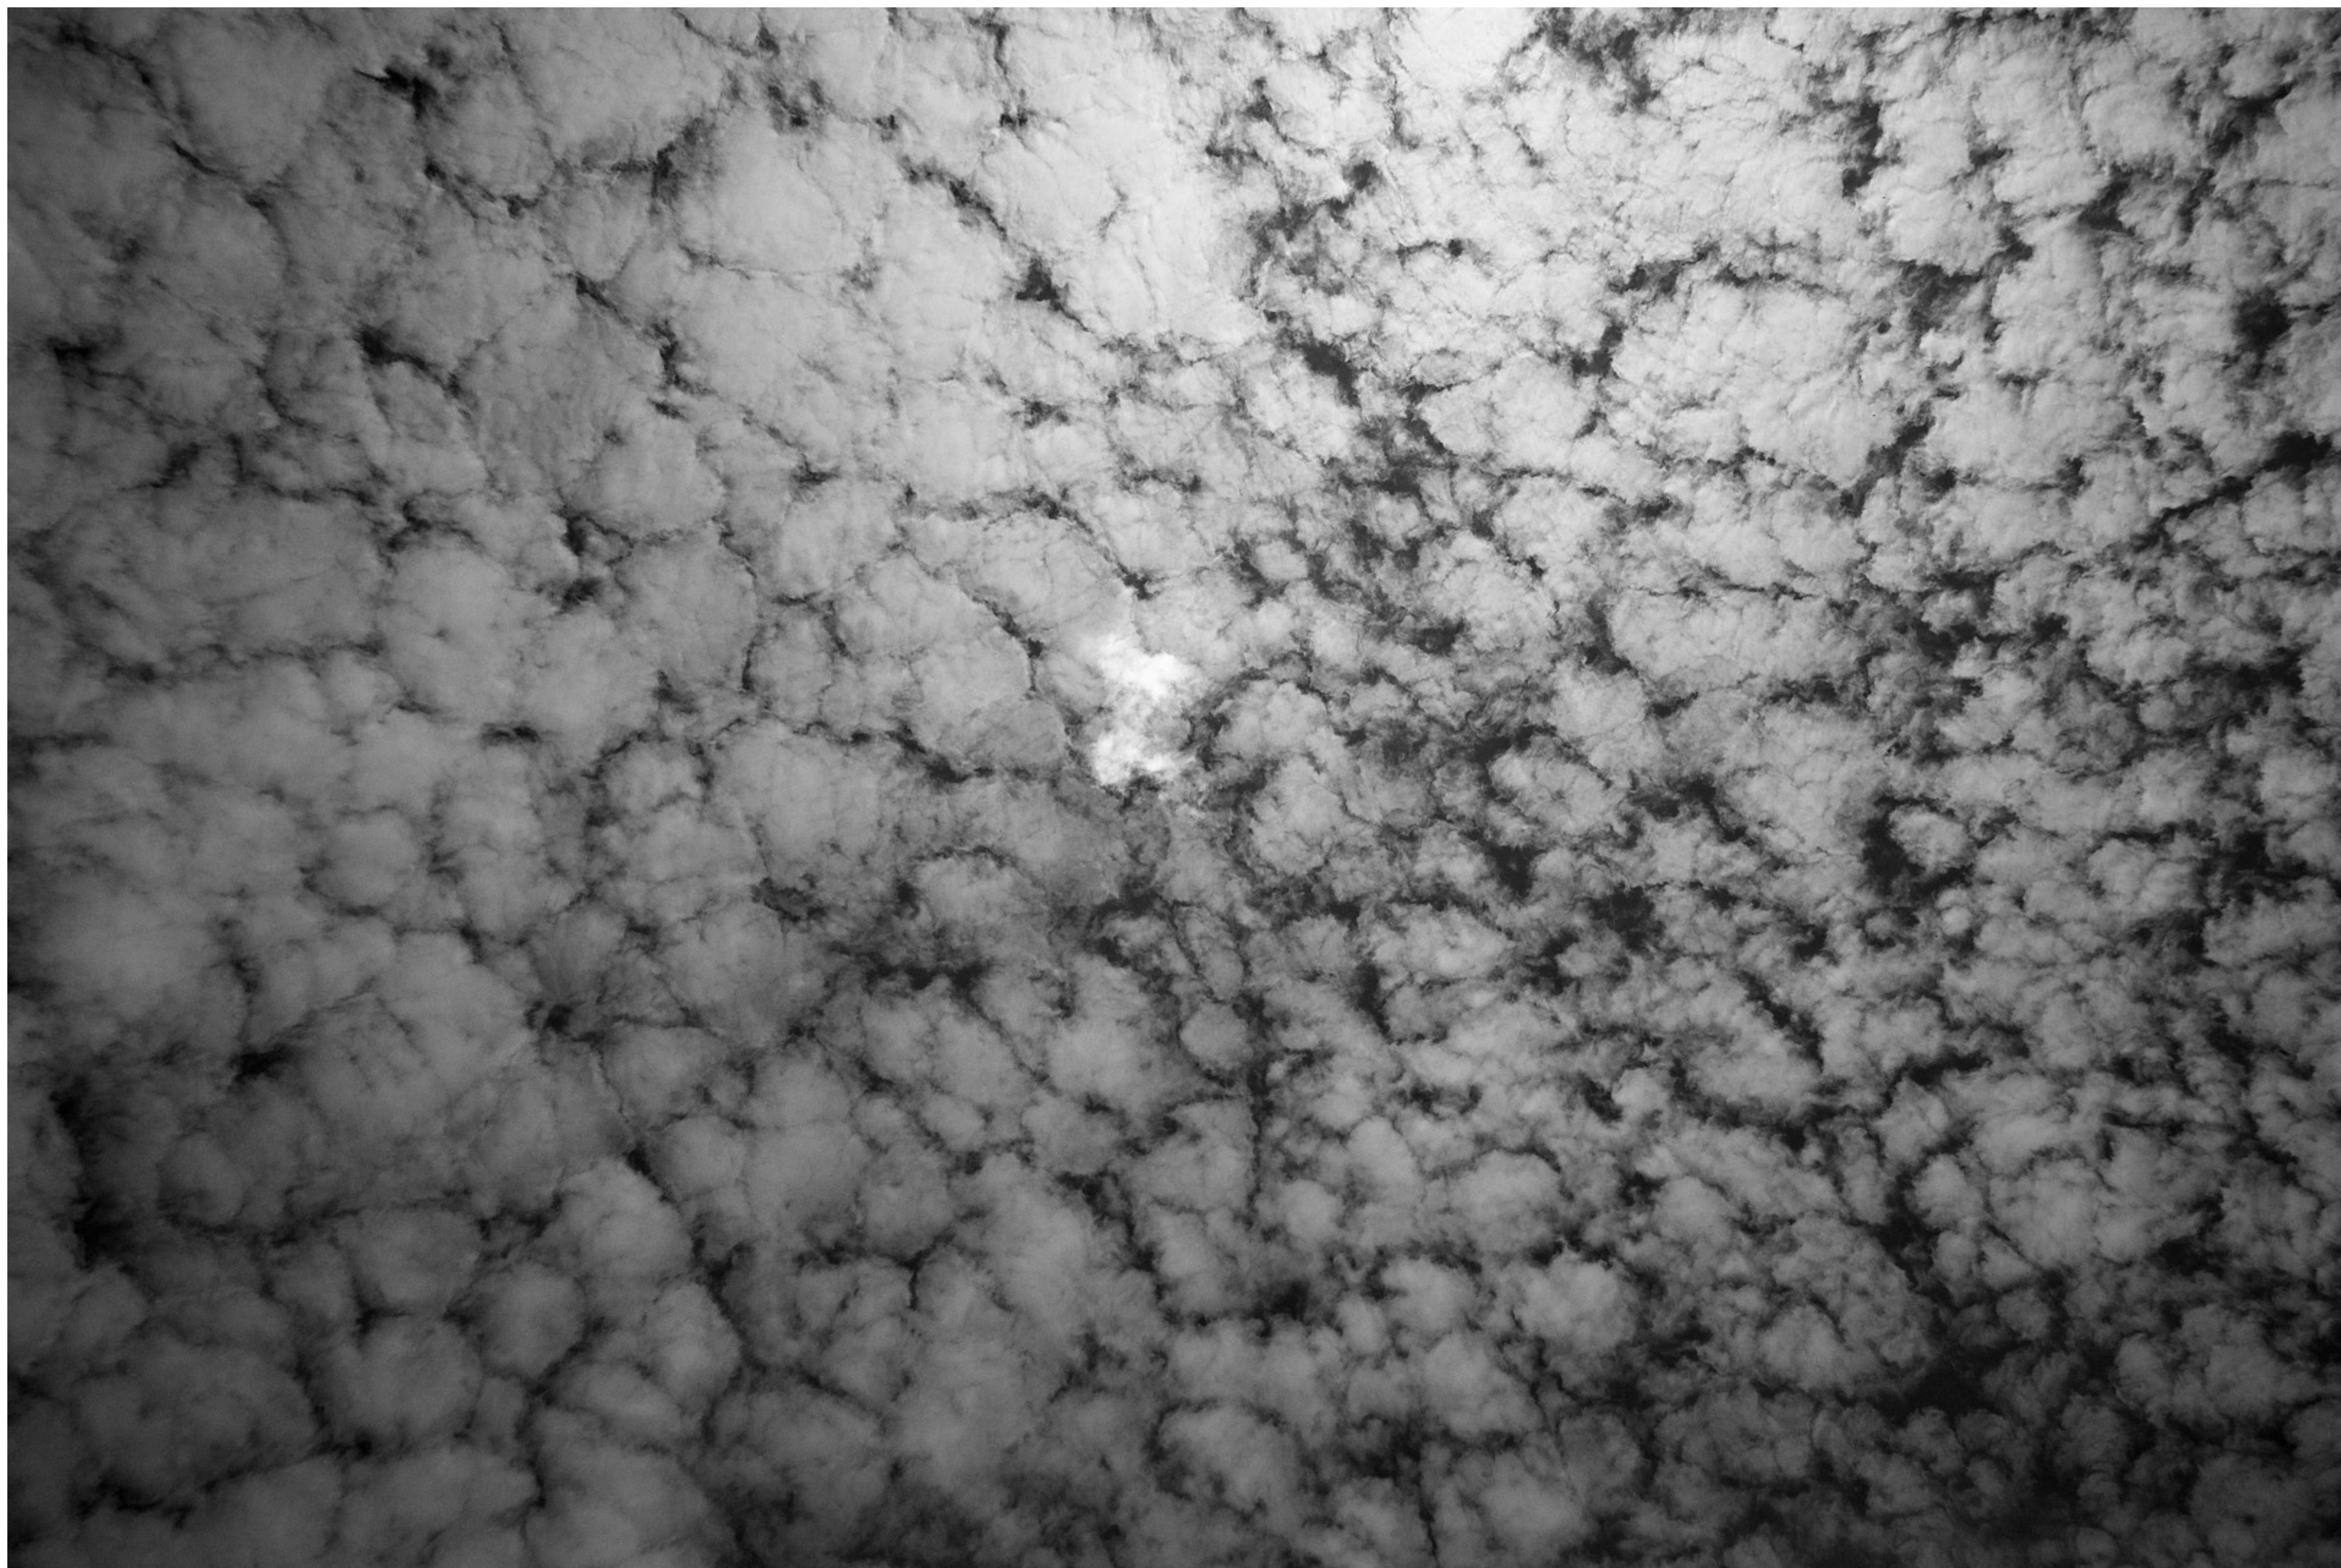

Inspired by my first ever project at photography college I decided to spend the lockdown looking up at the skies around me, especially relevant as I live under the Heathrow flightpath which was particularly quiet during this time.

Having initially started photographing queues of people, PPE and empty streets I soon realised that everyone would be doing some variation on that, and thought back to my first day at Newcastle college when we were sent out to discover the local area and we told in particular to "Look Up". That project was shot in black and white (film which I processed myself) and I thought it would lend itself very well to this project resulting in some striking graphic imagery.

Most of the photos were shot in my own back garden and the rest (including a shot of Heathrow from a hill just a few minutes walk from my house) were taken on my permitted daily exercise.

This is a small selection of some of those images.
